Deep Breath

Getting to know a company, just like getting to know a person, is about peeling back the layers to find all the gems within.

Waterworks Made Issue No. 03 is a deeper reveal, shining new light on layers of our product range, geographical reach and design inspiration. You'll see Waterworks in amazing hotel baths around the world. Our presence in London's ever-evolving design culture. A look at the special artistry behind our ceramic tile and more. We hope that the more we share, the closer we'll become.

I often think of Waterworks as a complex character, driven by our passions in the creative world around us. We both take inspiration and give it back, through our approach to design and the way we engage with our employees, clients and makers.

In that spirit, I want to call attention to the last item in this publication, the story of our friend and collaborator, Paul Egee. Please join us in celebrating Paul's 40-plus years of work with us and the impact he's had on our company, our culture and our products.

Handmade Ceramic Tile

A Matter of Material

An extraordinary medium to shape a design scheme, ceramic tile conveys beauty through its shape, surface texture, vast color palette, and potential array of sizes and patterns. Underlying each piece of handmade tile are all-natural raw materials that are artistically shaped and cut. Glaze application, traditional kiln firing and careful temperature controls render tiles with seductive depth and interest. Ultimately, the full appreciation of handmade tile can only be realized when dozens of individual tiles are studiously assembled on a wall or floor surface and linked by grout into a complete, one-of-a-kind installation.

Making 101

To make tile by hand, skilled artisans employ many of the same techniques their forerunners used 4,000 years ago. The first step is to carefully measure and mix feldspar, silica, talc and sand. These natural elements go into a machine called a muller, which is much like a sieve. What emerges is a large block of dark gray clay (for white body tile), that is then sent through an extruder to be flattened and cut to size. The next 30 or so steps are performed entirely by hand. These include sponging the edges of each tile, drying the tiles in a bisque kiln, glazing them with a hand spray or a waterfall application, and placing them in "setters" to be kiln-fired in the range of up to 1900° Fahrenheit.

Imperfectly Perfect

Handmade tile may be defined by its subtle variation from tile to tile. They're never perfectly smooth, nor perfectly square, and the color isn't uniform across the surface. While experience and skill guarantee consistency in quality, each original tile takes on the DNA of its maker. This rich heritage and artistic sensibility is timeless, ensuring that installations endure.

Appealing variations in each handmade piece imbue it with artistic sensibilities.

Paul Egee

Friend, colleague and collaborator for 45 years.

This month, we're paying homage to Paul Egee, whose intuitive approach to design and drawing talent have made an indelible mark on Waterworks. From our most iconic faucet to our most subdued fixtures, he's helped tell countless design stories in the company, honoring our culture and evolution in the process.

Paul is first and foremost an artist. It's as simple as that. He sees the world differently than most, and is immersed in all three dimensions at all times. Whether for a house, room or product, Paul's drawings take broad ideas and turn them into something tangible. His line work is impeccable, color sensibility nuanced; and proportions flawless. Together, they help us envision what can be.

His appreciation for both style and engineering translates into elegance that functions. Our engineers learn from Paul, and vice versa. An easygoing, approachable collaborator, he never lets his ego get in the way of exploring and adapting. As any designer knows, there are twists and turns in every project and story. Paul solves challenges in the development process with remarkable stoicism, ensuring that our clients get the best version of everything we dream up.

Paul also lives life and works on his own terms. Never one to just settle in, he comes and goes at odd hours and keeps his focus on the work. A consummate workhorse if you will, his focus is the work. For instance, he seldom takes time to clear up his office, which is typically a kaleidoscopic scene: Picture Paul amid a flurry of papers, sketches, books and pencils—with, for many years, his beloved Portuguese water dog underfoot. Those who know him best see the space as an expression of his creativity.

Kind, funny and a born storyteller, Paul is and will forever be a close friend and integral part of our heritage. He's informed a generation of leaders at Waterworks through his design philosophy and approach. For many, it's been like having a design and architecture professor in house. We look forward to introducing more products that he's touched.

Paul's exquisite drawings have been an essential aspect of Waterworks design process for decades.
